To identify cerebral plasticity and dominance, as well as their relationship with the extent of motor deficits in children with hemiplegic CP. Thirty children were studied, including 15 with hemiplegia, 9 with diplegia, and 6 with tetraplegia. All the patients received physical rehabilitation and occupational therapy three times a week for 2 months. A control group of 15 children was formed from a local community sample, matched for age and sex. The modified Yang's test of the cortical visual evoked potential (VEP) was used to determine cerebral dominance. The results showed that the majority of the children had abnormal VEP responses, and the abnormalities were more severe in the diplegic group. Significant differences were found in the latencies and amplitudes of the P100 wave in the left hemisphere during the Yang's test. The abnormalities were worse in the dominant side of the children with hemiplegic CP. These findings supported the existence of brain plasticity and dominance in the children with hemiplegic CP.
